

1. Film form is the set of deliberate choices a filmmaker makes about framing and distance — not accidents, but decisions that shape how an audience feels about a shot.
2. Shot types are named by how much of the subject they show. Fill in the missing abbreviations, tightest to widest: ECU → _____ → _____ → _____ → _____ → _____ → ELS.
3. A shot framed from behind one person's shoulder, showing another person beyond, is an _____-_____ shot (_____) — common in dialogue scenes.
4. A _____ shot shows exactly what a character sees — the camera sits at their eye line.
5. A brief shot of something other than the main action, used to add context or hide an edit, is called a _____.
6. Why would a director choose an ECU instead of a WS for the same story moment? What feeling does each create?

Discuss: Look back at your two-column script — which of your shots would work best as a CU or MCU, and which need to be a WS?
