

Bauhaus teacher Johannes Itten taught that the three basic geometric forms each carry a different felt character. Before you draw, act each one out: trace a square in the air (corner to corner, tense), a triangle (sharp, all angles), a circle (one continuous curve). Which one matches the site you're building?

Square

tense, corner-to-corner movement

90° angles · red

Triangle

sharp, full variety of angles

45° angles · yellow

Circle

evenly curved, continuously moving

135°/curve · blue

Kandinsky paired each angle with a color by temperature: acute (45°) = yellow (sharp, active), right (90°) = red (objective, direct), obtuse (135°, heading toward a curve) = blue (passive, cold). Use this as a starting rule for your own mark, you can break it, but only with a reason.

Which form character fits your brand, and why?

1. Sketch 3 thumbnails below, each combining 2–3 basic shapes (square, triangle, circle, or their variants) into one simple mark. Keep every thumbnail small, about the size of a favicon, if it doesn't read at that size, simplify it.

Circle your strongest thumbnail. That's what you'll build in Illustrator today (Design Development) and finalize on S2 (Implement).
